Welch Pond: This classic kettlehole bog and pond provides valuable wildlife habitat for beavers, herons, and ducks, while the surrounding bog mat is home to carnivorous pitcher and sundew plants. The view to the pond is often obscured by vegetation, but in the winter months the water can be seen clearly. The trail to the pond can be accessed from the intersection of three paths close to the Sunset Ridge development.

Philbin-Salmon Trail: This path skirts the highest point in Bolton (Wattaquadock Hill; 661') which was once marked by an observation tower; one of its anchor points can still be seen. ① A close look nearby reveals four survey marks ③ that are often obscured by leaves or stones. The trail descends gently through a grove of small pine trees, and then follows the edge of the condominium development to the junction with two other trails.

Gould Memorial Trail: For hikers arriving by car, this trail offers the best access to the area. This path is clear and easy to follow at first since it was once a cart path, but construction of the access road to the development forced the route to cross steep up-and-down terrain to the trail junction. Care is needed when negotiating this trail, especially in winter.

Connections: The Gould-White land (Map 11) via the Hapgood-Schechter Trail which starts 0.3 miles from the Philbin-Salmon trailhead on West Berlin Rd. Or, via the via the Sawyer Rd. trailhead, 0.25 miles eastwards.

Fyfeshire and Haynes-Wheeler (Map 15) properties via Sawyer Rd.

Suggested walks: In and out from either the Philbin-Salmon ① or Gould Memorial trailhead to explore the Welch Pond area, which is secluded despite its closeness to housing developments such as Sunset Ridge and the houses on West Berlin Rd. Up to 1 mile.

Wattaquadock Hill viewpoint. Starting from the Philbin-Salmon trailhead take a walk northward along West Berlin Rd. and follow the fence on the eastern side of the road (which is off the pavement by several feet. There is a splendid view ② towards Boston whose the skyline is visible in clear weather. .5 miles.
